aftermath. The play has drawn some of the greatest actors in the world and has been adapted into television, movies, and more. However, the play is said to be cursed!

Some say that Shakespeare wrote the play to get on King James I's good side. He not only set the play in Scotland, but also incorporated the King's interests in demonology with the Weird Sisters. It's said that Shakespeare took spells directly from a black magic book and their use is what caused the curse.

To avoid the curse, actors refrain from saying the name of the play inside a theatre. Instead, they refer to it as "The Scottish Play", "Mackers", or simply "That Play". When referring to the characters, they become "Mr and Mrs M", or "The Scottish King". If the name is spoken inside the theatre, the actor must leave the building, spin around 3 times, spit, curse, and knock on the door to be let back in. Another supposed counteraction is to quote lines from Hamlet. It may seem silly, but there are many who believe in this curse.

What would happen if one didn't counteract the curse? Supposedly, in its first production, the actor playing Lady Macbeth was suddenly struck with fever and died.

Because there is more swordplay in this play, the more it is performed, the more chance there is for someone to be injured. Accidents, deaths, fires, storms, riots, and other strange happenings have all been attributed to the curse.

The play was often run by theatres who were in debt as a last resort to try to bring in bigger audiences, as it is a popular play. Some theatres are unable to bounce back from their debts, so it is often the last play a company performs.
